In fact, faculty weigh diversity in only a small fraction of admissions decisions. Often, they rely upon criteria that keep longstanding inequalities in place. More equitable outcomes occur when admissions committees are themselves diverse and when members take a fresh look at inherited assumptions that affect their judgment.

Even with the questions Posselt raises about whether graduate departments are doing enough to promote diversity, she said her observations suggest that race and (in some programs) gender do count. If the Supreme Court should limit or bar the consideration of race in admissions decisions, as could happen this year, Posselt predicted a much more white graduate student body (and subsequent faculty) in higher education.
